The older cells pass through varying stages of fatty degeneration until they are forced from the mouth of the gland as sebum, a substance holding in suspension minute oil-globules. The sebaceous glands rest upon the erector papillre muscles, and are moved as the hairs move. No doubt the action of these muscles materially aids the ejection of the contents of the glands; vigorous brushing of the hair tends to increase the flow of this oily secretion. Swat-Glands.--The other glands developed from the epithelium are the tubular sweat-glands. Their development does not differ materially from that of the sebaceous glands, except that instead of assuming a racemous form they curl or coil upon themselves at their deepest extremity, in a very peculiar manner, presenting the appearance of a ball (Fig. 308). Vol. I.--36 The epithelial cells found in sweat-glands are polyhedral or cuboidal in form. Their office, implied in their name, is too well known to need further explanation. Development of the Enamel Ore/an.--The development of this organ differs but very little from that of the hair-follicle. This is especially true of the enamel organ of the permanent molars, the cords for which arise directly from the epithelial layer of the mucous membrane of the mouth. A detailed account of tlie development of the enamel organ does not fall within the province of this section; we will therefore confine ourselves to its simplest form of...
